"I came here as a child," I said reflectively. "I must have known Brighton for fifty years."

"And I for a hundred and fifty," he retorted, and saw my look travel swiftly to his face to see if he were joking—or crazy. Then he said suavely, "I must ask your pardon. You must suppose I am mad," and then again he muttered. "Like my poor old father," he seemed to be saying.

I thought it prudent, as well as kind, to pay no attention.

"Yes," I went on, "fifty years ago there were no gardens to compare with this. There might have been, if the fashionable folks had come in spring or summer. But they came in late autumn. Glorious November sunshine you get here. And a marvellous atmosphere! Wasn't it Richard Jefferies who compared it to the atmosphere of Seville—a 'glowing, light, bright, clear air, dry as dry'? And Sinclair Lewis, not so long ago, said of Brighton that it is 'as clear as Naples.' That was what brought the fashionables here in the latter part of the 19th century. They came in November."

"As late in the year as that?"

"Yes, there's usually lots of autumn sunshine and, if there isn't sun, there is 'skyshine,' a clearness that is almost as good. It brought people back regularly year after year. I can remember the sunshine gleaming on their shiny broughams and barouches with satiny horses and glittering harness. The Kings Road used to be full of them."

"Yes, yes," he murmured, nodding his head, "but not so dashing as the curricles we used to drive."

Again I darted a puzzled glance at him. I studied his profile for a second or two. Then I happened to look up to the statue of George the Fourth outside the north gate of the Pavilion. Instantly I saw the resemblance.

Though the face of the statue was older, coarser, it was the face of the man on the seat beside me. So the king whom the Duke of Wellington described as "so like old Falstaff that, damme, if I was not ashamed to walk into a room with him," must have looked in early middle age before he became Regent, at the period when Mrs. Fitzherbert found him the most romantic of lovers, while he was building the strangely improbable Eastern Palace that still astonishes and charms visitors to Brighton, with its cupolas and domes.

"Egad," he said pleasantly, "that infernal stone image has betrayed me. You know who I am?"

"I know who you were once," I replied gravely, "but I can't imagine what you are now, or how you got here, or—"

"You had better know," he told me. "I will explain. We spirits continue our existence in the other world so long as we are remembered in," he waved his hand round, "this world. If the memories of us are unfriendly, we have a horrid time—aches and pains, worries, remorse, regrets. If we are thought of with any affection, or pity, or even tolerance, we are not unhappy, and from time to time we can pay a visit to some spot we were fond of. Not very often, you know. It's a long time since I was here," he ended wistfully, looking about him with eager eye.

"You are allowed to dress in the prevailing mode, then?" I queried.

"Yes, yes, and to be for the short time of our leave as we once were. Which reminds me that if I do not take a stroll before lunch, I shall miss my appetite. Would you care to give me your company? You could show me what is new since I was here last.

"I always welcome new experiences." So we set off at once.

"Tell me," I said, as we walked towards the sea, "what first attracted you to Brighton?"

He smiled.

"You don't say 'Who?' Most of my friends in old days would have asked that. In truth, it was the bright atmosphere and the warm persistence of the sun that entranced me. Where do you breathe lighter, more invigorating air? Where can you enjoy at all times of the year more of the golden bounty of Old Sol?"

He noticed that I looked at him to see if he used the expression seriously.

"Somewhat antiquated my language, you are thinking. You moderns are so matter-of-fact! But I am right, am I not? It is the exceptional climate, exhilarating the mind, filling the body with vigour, storing up health, that ranks first among Brighton's charms. The clear air no doubt accounts also for the turquoise colour of the sea and the contrasting greenness of the Downs which ring the town. I ever felt the tonic effect of Brighton as soon as I reached here. That was what made me turn a fishing village into a fashionable resort, which has now become a famous place for seaside holidays."

"The most famous in the world," I added.

"Is that so, indeed?" Would Americans give it the palm over Atlantic City? Or the French over Cannes and Nice? Or the Belgians over Ostend? I have heard of all these places," he explained, "from acquaintances on the other side, though I have not seen them. You have, maybe?"

"Yes, I know them all, and Scheveningen in Holland and San Sebastian in Spain. They are famous, but Brighton overtops them. More people have heard of Brighton than of any of them. In a novel by one of our most interesting recent authors a man from the Midlands knows of Brighton as 'a romantic name.' That is what it had been to Arnold Bennett himself while he lived in the Potteries. It is 'a romantic name' to people all over the country. Outside the country, too. Its reputation is international. No one who reads English books can help hearing of it. It has a secure place in literature."

"And all," he asserted, standing still and laying a large hand over his chest, "due to me."

"In the first instance, certainly," I agreed. "But think how much has been done since your time. Your father did for another seaside town what you did for Brighton, yet that town has never rivalled Brighton."

"It had not the same advantages."

"Nor was it so near London. You know there is now an hourly service of electric trains each way, doing the journey in sixty minutes."

"Prodigious! In one hour! When I recall the time it took in coach or post-chaise! The discomfort, too—so cramped and unsteady."

"Now you hardly know you are moving unless you look out of the window. And, besides those sixty-minute trains, there are many others. In fact, it is almost as easy to get to London from here as it is to get there from the outer suburbs. That partly accounts for so many people coming to live in Brighton. Not entirely, of course. Many come for health reasons. Lots of the "retired" find that is to keep their lungs filled with ozone and their old bones warmed by sunshine. I know a man who was told by the doctors that he had worn himself out in business and could never be more than a wreck. I tell you he thinks nothing of walking the whole length of the sea-front."

The best of all ways
To lengthen their days

"Nearly two miles, I take it?"

"Six miles."

"Six, do you say?"

"From the western end of Brighton, where Hove begins, to Saltdean, which is beyond Rottingdean and now in the borough, is six miles. Take in the Hove frontage and you get eight miles."

"Egad, and, when I built the Pavilion, that was on the edge of the town, and the houses did not stretch out far up the cliff eastwards. They went back a fair distance though."

"Yes, and some of the old streets are still there, little altered. As for the Lanes, they must be almost exactly what they were in your day. Would you care to see?"

"Nothing would interest me more," he declared, and as soon as we were in the maze of narrow alleys lined with shops in which you can pick up bargains in furniture, books, pictures, brass, china, what-you-will, he showed his interest by constant exclamations of pleasure.

"There is nothing else like this in England," I told him. "It is one of the half-dozen separate Brightons that must be studied before one can say one knows the town. Kemp Town is another. For early nineteenth-century architecture it has no equal, except, perhaps, in that part of Bath which lies across the river. Nothing finer has been done in town planning than Sussex Square, with its crescent and two flanking terraces, all of majestic mansions ('majestic' is the word!) and with those wide-spreading gardens of tender beauty as the centre of all. If you look through the flowering bushes and the cedar trees and across the lawns of those gardens to the blue sea, you get an effect that could not be beaten at Monte Carlo, or anywhere else in the Mediterranean. For charm combined with dignity, where could you beat Royal Crescent?"

"Yet again there is a relic of the old fishing village in the morning market on the beach between the Piers. The fishing boats come on with their catches and the fish are put up for sale at once. A long time ago Brighthelmstone used to be a great place for herrings. It was given to one of the Conqueror's Knights as a manor and had to provide him with 4,000 herrings a year. But they don't frequent the Channel much now.

"Another Brighton is that of the little bow-fronted houses, with their elegant canopied balconies and air of doll's-house daintiness—which date, I suppose, from mid-nineteenth century years, the early Victorian period, and by way of contrast you have only to look at the houses in the newest styles of architecture up towards the Dyke or at Roedean, where they have their view of the sea across a wide belt of grassland.

"Next there is the Brighton of the big hotels. They have their own styles, not by any means uniform or monotonous. They stand up along a small section of the front, huge and palatial, and to many people who come here regularly they are Brighton, though they form really but one aspect of the place."

"The discomfort too—so cramped and unsteady."

" Ah, but what an aspect ! How magnificent ! When I think of my Brighton—"

" You can do more than think of it. You can look at it. Of your Brighton there is quite enough left, beside the Lanes, to give us an idea what it was like. Little streets that have a certain dignity, that proclaim their origin in a past when even the dwellings of the humble were allowed the charm of just proportions and a trace of ornament."

" I see," my companion said drily, " you are a man of taste in such matters. I make no doubt that many who come here share your interest. But for those who seek entertainment, is there a Brighton for them also ? "

We were just turning into West Street.

" Here it is," I was able to reply. " Over there is the Ice Skating Rink—this afternoon, if you are inclined, we might watch the skaters, or this evening we could sample as well an ice spectacle that you would not see equalled outside of Canada."

" This evening ? " He turned a puzzled face towards me. " You are pleased to be facetious. Unless the climate has greatly changed, frost hard enough to freeze water is rare at Brighton, even in winter-time."

" It isn't the climate, it's science. The ice is made artificially—much better plan than waiting for Nature."

" Skating all the year round ! " he murmured. " Yet not more marvellous than plays without actors and actresses."

" Ah, you mean the pictures ? A marvel, certainly, but so familiar that most of us forget that side of it. As you see, if you look around you, cinemas abound in Brighton. In number and in comfort and in excellence of programmes they are ahead of any place but London—and there you may have to go miles to get to them, while here they are at your doors. Same with the theatres. We haven't done away with the living drama entirely, you know. Just now there are four plays running, two on the piers, two in the town theatres. All winter a repertory company puts on a different piece each week, often pieces that haven't been seen before out of London, and acts them very well."

" Music, I am afraid, must be neglected amid this galaxy of other attractions."

" Not at all. If you want popular stuff, bands supply it two or three times a day on the piers. Military bands mostly, best of their kind, anyway. Then there are plenty of concerts in your own Dome, where the best music, old and new, is performed by the best artists. There's a bandstand in the Aquarium, too, and a Concert Hall—"

" Do not tell me they have taught fish to sing ! "

" No, no, not yet. This is one of the Aquarium's side-shows. Like the Sun Terrace restaurant and the open-air café and the miniature golf-course and the ' green ' made of matting for bowls. All sorts of diversions besides the fish. I believe visitors from the North spend whole days in the Aquarium and even admit that they like it as well as Blackpool Tower."

"From the North of England? Do you tell me that holiday-makers travel as far as that?"

"They think nothing of it. They can get a train from Lancashire or Yorkshire or the Midland cities, which brings them straight to Brighton without change and without going through London. Saves a lot of time and bother. Through trains from Wales and the West of England, too. Brighton has a lure that draws people from all over the country. They want to see it in the first instance because they've heard so much about it, and after that they come back again and again to a place that has more than fulfilled their expectations. They like the gentle air, caressing, yet bracing. They like the immensity of clear sky and vast spread of sea, which makes the light so brilliant. They revel in the absence of smoke.

"Odd fishes some of them are. Two middle-aged men from Manchester spent a large part of their time on the electric railway that runs from the little station near the Palace Pier to Black Rock and the Swimming Pool. The miniature cars took their fancy; the ride along the shingle with the swish of the waves in their ears and the salt tang of the air in their nostrils—the murmurs and scents of the infinite sea—were both a complete change from ordinary days and literally a re-creation—they swore they felt new men."

My companion was so excited by the idea of this railway that I took him along it. We rode as far as we could, saw the big new parking-place on the beach, and had a good look at the Swimming Pool, which pleased him vastly. He told me about the early years of sea-bathing, when it was not done for pleasure and exercise, but as a cure for certain ailments. He remembered the first bathing-machines and an elderly bathing-woman who "gave the treatment," ducked the "patients" and was sulkily disliked for her attentions. The modern swim-suit, alike for men and women, allowing the supple grace of straight backs, lithe arms, firm legs, to be seen, seemed to him a great improvement on the voluminous costumes of serge or thick flannel that were insisted on in his day.

From the Pool we walked along the Undercliff path towards Rottingdean. Again he used the word "marvellous." The shoring up of chalk cliffs with concrete, the walling of their base with granite, the wide walk sheltered from all but south winds, took his eye and set his thoughts at work. "What must it have cost?" he enquired, and "What made them undertake so enormous a labour?"

I explained that the incalculable force of the sea had worn away the cliffs so fiercely that a halt had to be called. When houses at Black Rock almost fell into the water and had to be abandoned, when it became dangerous to walk along the top, something had to be done. Breakwaters alone, however solid, were not enough. So this immense work was put in hand and brought to a fortunate end. It gave Brighton, not merely defence against the sea for a long stretch of coast-line, but this unique undercliff walk and a new road on the top, with safety and comfort for walkers on the edge.

We strolled through Rottingdean Village. I pointed out the Kipling-Burne-Jones house (now occupied by another Jones, Sir Roderick, head of Reuter's). He assured me the church was exactly as he remembered it. I asked him if Tudor Close had changed much. He wrinkled his brows. He had no recollection, yet it must have been there, it looked so authentically Tudor. Then I confessed to pulling his leg and told him it was not more than a score of years old, one of the cleverest bits of reproduction to be found anywhere. After which we got on a 'bus and were whirled back to the Old Steine in less than a quarter of an hour, past Roedean School and the "pitch and putt" golf course which has become so popular.

I drew his attention as we went along to the coaches and "sharries" that penetrate Sussex in all directions.

"In your time," I said, "I suppose very few people cared about seeing the country. Of course, it wasn't so well worth seeing as it is now. Not so well cared for. More unkempt and ragged, I imagine. Now there aren't so many gloomy woods and wild heaths. It's been tidied up; had a shave and a haircut. Yet getting civilisation hasn't spoiled it. More care is taken of ancient buildings, for instance. Roads are infinitely cleaner and smoother. I'm sure the little old towns that can be visited so easily from Brighton—Lewes and Arundel, for example—are in far better shape than they were a century back; and the pretty villages you come upon so often can't have had the same charm when they were thick in mud and many of the cottages falling to bits."

"No, no, no charm for us outside the town. We went up to the Downs to course hares and ride races. Is that done still?"

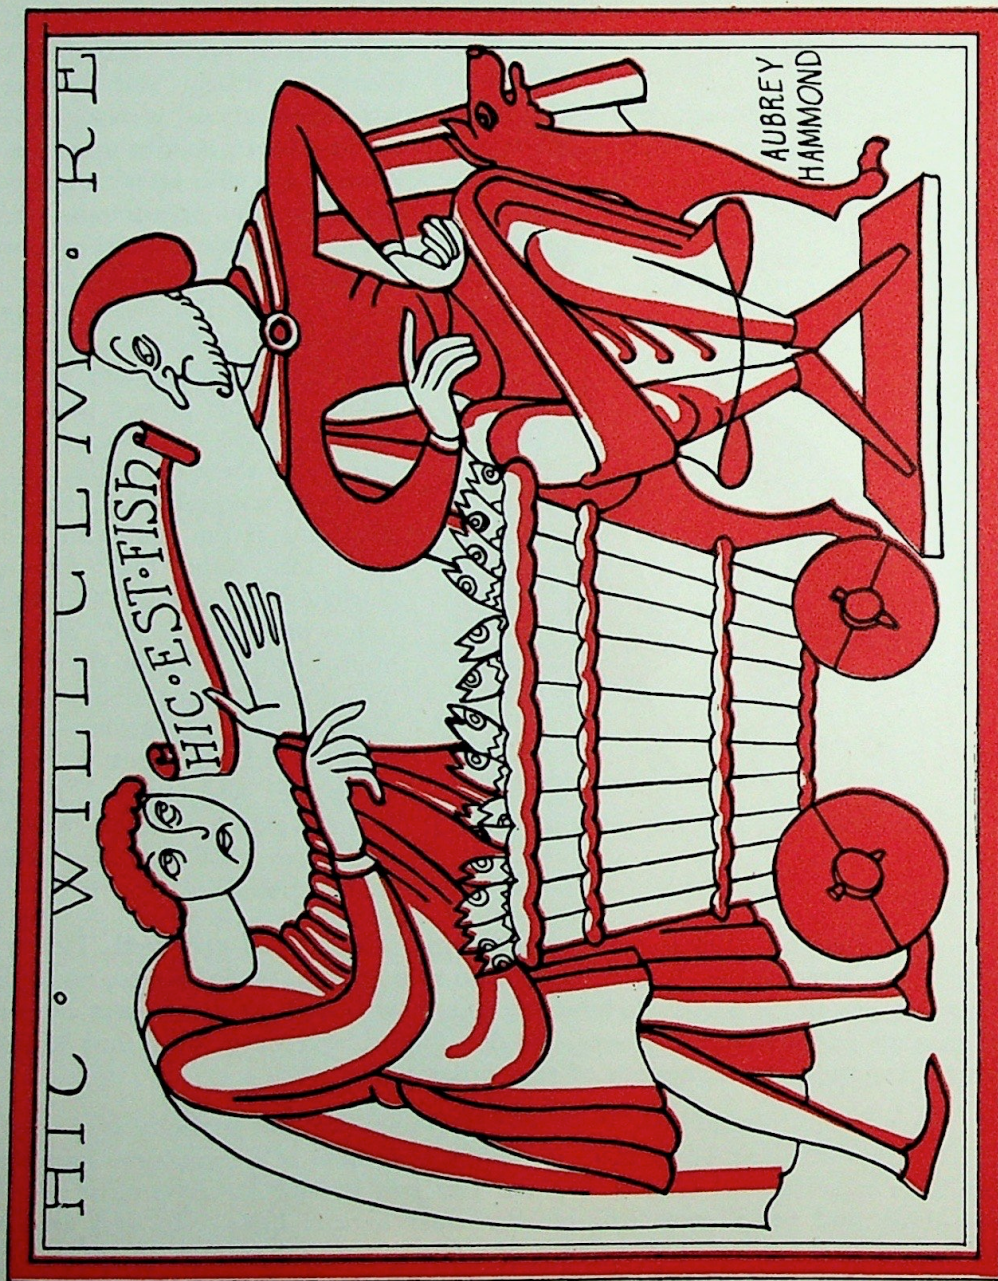

"The gentle air, caressing yet bracing"

"You won't be able to find any coursing now. But there's plenty of riding, and anyone who cares about walking can spend days of delight up there. Even those who aren't walkers can make the acquaintance of the Downs without putting foot to ground. The Devil's Dyke, with one of the finest views across miles of their exquisitely-drawn, soothingly-green undulations, is now almost part of Brighton—the omnibuses go there, and there's a train, too, for those who can't walk—and all along at the back you can find the little lost Down churches of Kipling and the time-worn farms and manor houses in the folds of the hills, the rings (Chanctonbury and Cissbury) of the druids—perhaps! and dew-ponds and sheepcotes and 'gaps,' those narrow passes through which pack-horses toiled before even Roman times."

"Again, my good friend, you soar above me. Nature is all very well. History might be an entrancing study if there were no women to be made love to, no cards or races to bet on. We used to hunt on the Downs and pit our horses against one another and play cricket—yes, we did, indeed, when we could find a level pitch! Are there no diversions of that order to-day?"

"Any number," I told him. "They're not in my line, but anybody who wants to chase foxes can hear of 'meets' in plenty, and there is a racecourse high up, where four meetings are held each year. But golf is what interests most people now-a-days, and the Downs provide first-class natural links. In and around Brighton there are at least half-a-dozen of a fine sporting character, and I am told Hollingbury Park is one of the best municipal courses in the country. The Corporation also provide any number of lawn tennis courts—not your sort of tennis—oh, you know? There is a "second" Wimbledon up at Withdean, quite new. Centre Court, with seats for 4,000 spectators. Most of them filled, too, when there are championship matches on.

"Had to provide him with 4,000 herrings a year."

"And as for cricket, well, most people watch it now instead of playing, and at the Sussex County Club ground you can see the most famous players in first-class county matches."

"And for assemblies, now, where are they held?"

For a moment I hesitated. Then I recollected that "assemblies" in his day meant parties.

"Ah, we've changed all that," I said. "Your assemblies were for the nobs. Dancing was then an amusement for nobs only. Now everybody dances—or can, if they want to. I could take you to half-a-dozen halls where you would find a capital floor, a lively band, pleasant surroundings, and a company both as mixed and as well-behaved as you might find anywhere. And, by the way, there are still what may be called 'assemblies' in your Pavilion. The Corporation owns it now, you know—or perhaps you didn't know?"

He nodded and smiled.

"I suppose it seems odd to you, but they keep it spick-and-span, and I can assure you, when they give a party there it's like old times."

He shook his head at that.

"Oh, well, of course the costumes aren't so colourful or the manners so formal, and it's more respectable than your assemblies used to be, if you'll forgive my saying so. But it makes quite a gay scene when balls or banquets are on.

"The Pavilion has another use, too. It's a favourite place for conferences—you don't seem to know what they are; mass gatherings, political or trade union, social or religious, where speeches are made day after day from nine or ten in the morning till five in the afternoon."

"Good God!" the Prince jerked out.

"Exactly. You can understand why the people who attend such orgies want to be in a nice place where they can enjoy themselves as well as talk. Brighton is the favourite conference centre in the country."

"Would you," he asked with a wistful air, "accompany me while I revisit my Pavilion, my dream-palace, the scene of so many events in my life, both happy and tragical?"

"With the greatest pleasure, if you would let me offer you some lunch first—that is, if you . . ."

"For our visits to your world we are provided with the—er—usual arrangements. I feel what I used to call my Brighton appetite. Let us lunch by all means."

The Pavilion is amusing. It calls up memories of a past that was vivid as well as vulgar, romantic as well as raffish. It is an essential part of Brighton, a picturesque reminder of the man who (as he boasted) turned the little fishing village called Brighthelmstone into a health and pleasure haunt that has become famous, not in this country alone, but throughout the world. Preston Manor strikes a deeper imaginative note. It has the authentic quality which is known as English. Thomas Western would have hated the architectural oddity of the Regent's creation. He would have disliked scornfully the flamboyant foreign manners of the Hanoverian. We, fortunately, can feel more tolerant; we can interest ourselves in both aspects of the 18th century, which these two dwellings illustrate so aptly.

I was occupied with these reflections as we walked once more through the delightful gardens of the Steine which the strings of tiny lamps lit at night-fall turn into a twinkling, many-coloured dusk of stars. My companion was deep in his own thoughts, too. At last he came out with "Damme, it's most gratifying! How many hotels do you say?"

"I really couldn't give you a figure. They are as the sands of the sea—that is, if you include in their number all the places that provide for visitors' accommodation, from the simplest to the most elaborate."

"And all due to my taste and foresight," he exclaimed. "As they said of . . . who was it? Augustus?—that he found Rome brick and left it marble, so it can be related of me that I came to a scatter of fishermen's huts and turned them into streets of palaces. Not only on the Front, either."

We were in North Street now and he was looking up at some of the new buildings in this fine shopping thoroughfare—only one of several that Brighton possesses.

"I could almost boast," he went on complacently, "that 'alone I did it.' You do not agree?" he queried, seeing that I smiled.

"Well," I said, "you were not the first English King to come to Brighton, you know. Don't you remember Charles the Second's visit when he was Prince of Wales and on the run?"

"I have heard some legend . . ."

"Oh, it's authentic. True, he only stayed a few hours."

"But I was the first to see its possibilities," he persisted petulantly, "though I confess I did not foresee what it would grow into."

"You certainly began it," I admitted, "but the good work has been carried on by many hands since. Even in your own day the great Cham—"

"Ah, you allude to Doctor Johnson. My father had a high opinion of him; he was received at the Palace. Did he come here?"

"Before you did. As early as 1782."

"Is that so, indeed? I paid my first visit in 1783."

"He had 'passed almost a whole year,' he complained, 'in a succession of disorders,' and arrived 'in such a state of weakness that he rested four times in walking between the inn and the lodging.' I suppose he had to get his meals at the inn?"

"No doubt, no doubt. That was the usual practice."

"After a short stay he grew better and was 'reasonably easy.'"

"Then, a little later, Jane Austen was saying that 'a visit to Brighton comprised every possibility of earthly happiness.'"

"Indeed, a sensible young woman. I read her novels with interest. Yes, yes, I sent her a message once."

He sighed heavily, and I went on quickly.

"You remember Cobbett, too? He said that Brighton 'surpassed in beauty all other towns in the world, whether as to the streets, the buildings, the carriages, the horses or the dress of the people.'"

"H'm, Cobbett? Did he? Shouldn't have thought it. A low fellow. A firebrand. A damn'd revolutionary. Appears to have had some sense, though."

"Thackeray—he was after your time—perhaps you haven't . . ."

"Heard of him, heard of him. We know what's going on here. What about him?"

"He was enthusiastic about Brighton. He even praised you, and said myriads of Londoners ought to thank you for 'inventing' Brighton."

"Indeed? Yet that, I infer, is the same Mr. Thackeray, I believe, who libelled me grossly in his 'Four Georges.'"

"In 'The Newcomes' he mentioned you as 'beloved George,' and as to your 'invention,' he called it 'one of the best of physicians, kind, cheerful, merry, Dr. Brighton.' All as true now as it was when he wrote it. 'Hail,' he said, 'thou purveyor of shrimps and honest prescriber of South Down mutton! There is no mutton so good as Brighton mutton; no cliff so pleasant to ride on; no shops so beautiful to look at as the Brighton gimcrack shops'—he meant the Lanes—'and the fruit shops, and the market.' They are still here (though the market has been moved to Circus Street), and for the most part they are as 'beautiful' as ever."

"A happy phrase, that—my 'invention.' Quite true, egad. If I had not chosen it and made it my abode, it must have remained unknown, obscure. You are smiling again, I see. Surely you would not dissent from that view?"

"I think I do," I answered. "I think Brighton must have become the most popular of English seaside places, even if you had never seen it. Nothing could have kept it back. Its nearness to London, its exhilarating air, the vast expanse of blue sea in front and the vast green sheltering stretches of the Downs behind it, combined to favour the town. It attracted with equal success the masses and the classes, as the Victorians called them. That novel of Arnold Bennett's which I quoted from this morning contrasts Brighton with 'the pleasure cities of the poor and of the middling.' This was not quite the way to look at it, but Edwin Clayhanger paid his first visit during the fashionable season in October. Even then there were other seasons. Now it is a pleasure city for all, no matter how heavy or light the purse, how exalted or humble the position. Clayhanger saw chiefly the Brighton of the rich. He 'had not conceived what wealth could do when it organised itself for the purpose of distraction.' He began to feel the influence of this organising when he got into the Pullman train at Victoria. Everybody who was travelling by it seemed to be cheerfully anticipating enjoyment. And when he stood in the Kings Road, all the faces he saw were 'triumphant—they were correct and successful.' All the buildings were to match. The piers even were 'laden with correctness and domination.'

"Bennett felt the charm of Brighton, as so many writers have—writers of such opposite temperaments and aims as Herbert Spencer, the philosopher, and William Black, the novelist, who both lived in Kemp Town. A list of the well-known people who have stayed in Brighton and spoken well of it would fill the pages of a book almost as big as the Telephone Directory. A good many of the famous have lived here—and do live here now. On the front at Brighton you can see, if you walk there all the year round, most of the prominent figures in the life of the day—literary and legal, social and commercial, theatrical, political. You are reminded, too, of something else Richard Jefferies wrote—that there are more handsome women in Brighton than anywhere else in the world."

"Damme, that's what I always said. It's true."

"I wonder. It may be they seem more handsome because you are keyed up by the air and sunshine, making you feel that 'all's right with the world'? Or do the air and sunshine give that 'super' touch to their good looks?"

"Probably a little of both," he chuckled, and with that chuckle he was suddenly—not there.

"And he never once," I murmured to myself, "never once mentioned the battle of Waterloo."*

ROYAL PAVILION.

Among the many interesting public buildings in Brighton, the unique Royal Pavilion, built by the Prince of Wales (afterwards George IV) as a marine residence, deserves special mention, and is one which no visitor should fail to inspect. Following its occupation by George IV the building was subsequently the seaside home of William IV and Queen Victoria for varying periods, lasting from 1784 until 1845. Purchased by the town authorities in 1850, it is now the social centre of the town, and makes, with the reconstructed Dome and Corn Exchange, an ideal venue for the many important national conventions and conferences which visit Brighton from time to time, and also for concerts, exhibitions, etc. Recent discoveries have revealed the presence of original interior decorative work and the interior is now in process of being carefully restored to its beauty of Regency days.

The State Apartments and other rooms in the Royal Pavilion are open to visitors on week-days from 10 a.m. to 1 p.m., and, in addition, on Mondays from May to September from 2 to 5 p.m. The upper rooms contain over 1,200 prints, etc., relating to Old Brighton. A charge of 6d. Adults and 3d. Children is made for admission. Rated inhabitants of the town and their families are admitted free on the first Monday of every month. The whole (or part) of the Lower Suite of Rooms of the Royal Pavilion may be hired for Balls, Banquets, Wedding Receptions, Meetings, etc., at moderate rates. The grounds are well laid out and open free to the public. A guide to the building is on sale.

THE PYLONS.

WAR AND PEACE MEMORIALS.

BRIGHTON WAR MEMORIAL. At northern end of Old Steine. Erected to commemorate the sacrifice of all the Brighton men and women who gave their lives in the Great War.

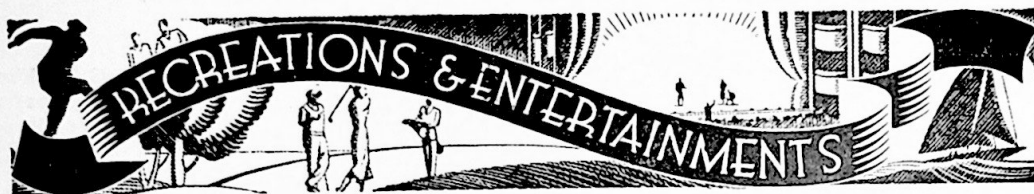

THE CHATTRI. Situated about $1\frac{1}{2}$ miles north of Patcham ('Bus to Patcham and thence walk across Downs). Erected at the joint cost of the Brighton Corporation and the India Office, as a memorial to all the Indian soldiers who died in the Great War. The key to the enclosure can be obtained on application at The Lodge, Patcham Place, Patcham.

INDIAN MEMORIAL GATEWAY. At the southern entrance to the Royal Pavilion. Erected at the cost of certain Indian Princes and other subscribers as a permanent memorial of their gratitude and that of the peoples of India for the generous hospitality and kindness shown to the wounded Indian soldiers by the Corporation and inhabitants of Brighton during the earlier part of the Great War.

THE PEACE MONUMENT. On the sea front marking the boundary between Brighton and Hove. Erected in 1912, at the expense of the inhabitants of Brighton and Hove, to the memory of King Edward VII.

SOUTH AFRICAN WAR MEMORIAL. On the sea front opposite West Pier. Erected in 1904 to the memory of the officers, non-commissioned officers and men of the Royal Sussex Regiment who fell in the South African War, 1900-1902.

EGYPTIAN CAMPAIGN, 1882 AND NILE EXPEDITION, 1884-85, MEMORIAL. At the northern end of Old Steine. Erected by the officers, non-commissioned officers and men of the 1st Battn. Royal Sussex Regiment to the memory of their comrades who were killed in action or who died of wounds or diseases contracted during the Egyptian Campaign, 1882 and the Nile Expedition, 1884-85.

(I)—RECREATIONS, Etc.

Few Resorts can compare with Brighton as regards provision for Recreation, Sport and Entertainment. WALKING. See under "Motoring, Cycling and Walking."

CHILDREN'S RECREATIONS. In addition to the never-failing attraction of the beach, where safe paddling can be had and sand castles built when the tide is out, the Children's Boating Pool by the West Pier is always a source of delight to youngsters. Here, under the care of watchful attendants, the young navigator can paddle his own canoe and manipulate his tiny row-boat, paddle-boat or power-boat in perfect safety. In Queen's Park and at the Level there are Model Yacht Ponds and Children's Playgrounds with all sorts of equipment for the enjoyment of young people. Among the attractions specially suitable for children the Aquarium is one of the most popular.

(2)—ENTERTAINMENTS

AQUARIUM (on Sea Front). 'Phones : Brighton 2094-5. This world-famous institution offers a wide range of entertainment to young and old. A description of its attractions falls naturally into four sections :—

1. The Aqua-Marine Section, in which thousands of living specimens of a wide range of species are exhibited, holds a fascination for everyone. Unique Scenic display of exotic fish from many Foreign Countries. Tidal Pool, Alligator Cavern and many other attractions. The fish and Penguins are fed daily at 12 noon and 3 p.m.

2. The Sun Terraces above the Aquarium, facing sun and sea, afford spacious rendezvous for rest and pleasure. On the Western Terrace are a miniature Golf Course and a series of deck games, including "Shuffleboard," "Golf Drive," and Automatic Putting Devices ; whilst on the spacious Eastern Terrace is a Band Stand and a Café Restaurant. Open-air refreshments on the Continental style. Daily al fresco tea dances, and illuminated Carnival Dances at night.

3. The Theatre Ball Room. Throughout the year this magnificent hall is used for dancing, affording accommodation on a first-class floor for 1,000 people. In the winter months the Theatre is also used as an indoor Bowling Green with four full-sized rinks, the headquarters of the Brighton, Hove and District Indoor Bowling Club (450 members) Visitors are cordially welcomed and everything is done for their comfort and enjoyment.

4. The Medical Baths (entrance on Madeira Drive) for men and women provide an excellent range of treatments for rejuvenating mind and body. All the treatments provided have the approval of modern medical practice. They include Pine, Pinocologne, Iodine, Oatmeal, Soda and Hot Sea Water, Mustard-Bran, Sulphur, Epsom Salts, Tar and Sulphorube Baths. The accommodation includes 24 Baths and a commodious Rest Room. Special terms for Football, Cricket and Athletic Teams. Tariffs and other particulars from the General Manager.

In addition to the Café Restaurant on the Sun Terrace, there is a commodious and well appointed Restaurant at the main entrance. For the convenience of visitors, a subway gives direct access from the Aquarium to the Beach, thereby obviating the necessity of crossing the wide Madeira Drive. This subway also leads direct to a very comprehensive Amusement Arcade, including a Scenic Railway, Scoota Boat Pool, Dodgem Cars, Ghost Train, Mirror Maze and the latest devices for the amusement of children, such as Jungle Ride, Brighton Speedway, etc.

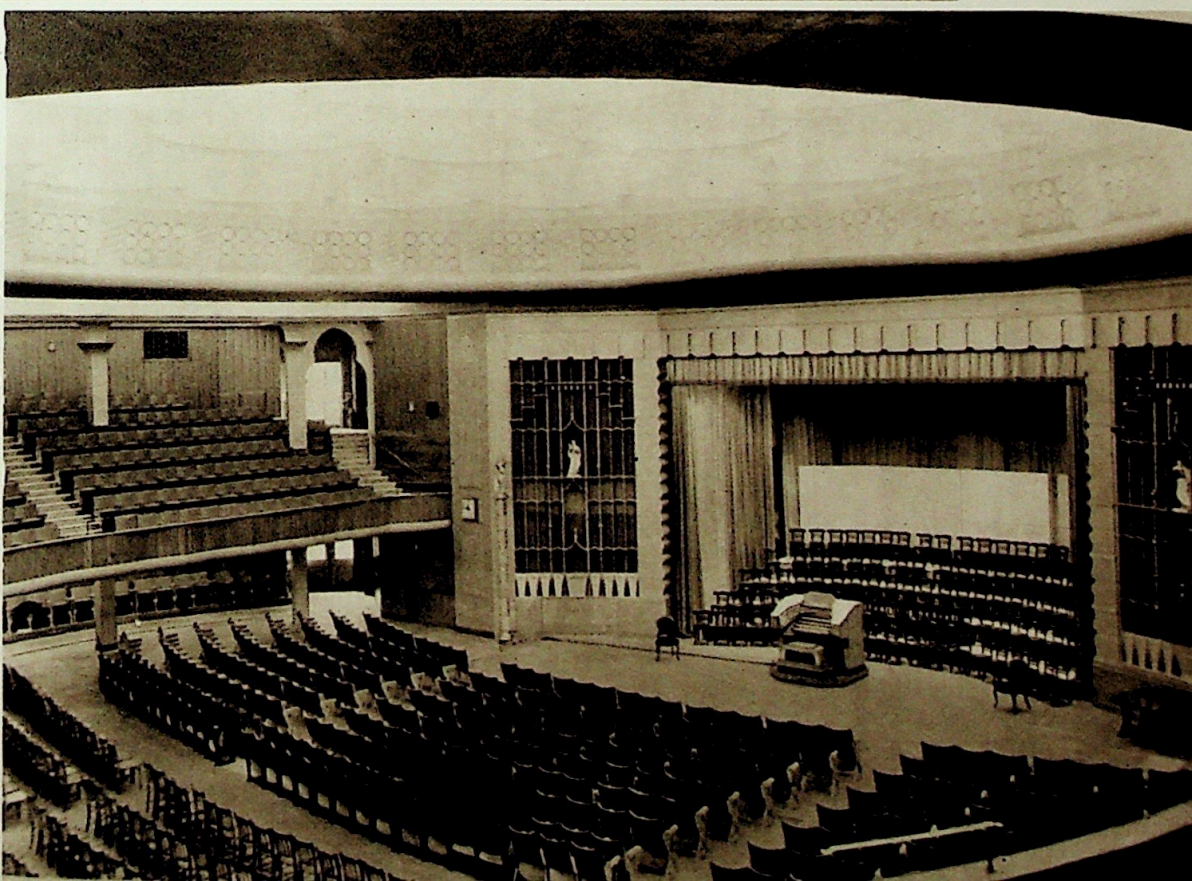

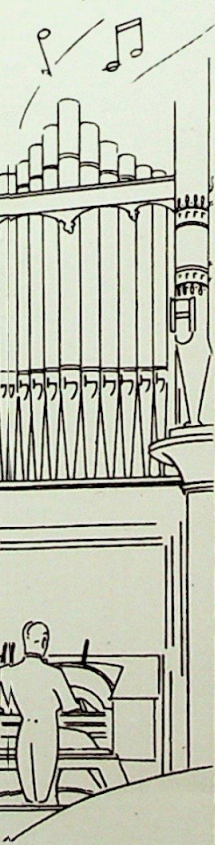

SPORTS STADIUM, West Street. One of the most modern Ice Rinks in the World. During winter months Skating Sessions are held three times daily on an ice surface measuring 17,500 square feet. Accommodation for over 1,500 skaters. Exhibitions of skating by world famous skaters every Saturday evening. On Thursdays at 8.15 p.m. the famous "Brighton Tigers" play Ice Hockey matches against other noted teams. International matches from time to time. Ample accommodation for spectators. The Sports Stadium has already gained a great reputation in the production of Ice Shows. Last summer "PATRIA" played to more than 250,000 spectators. An entirely new show will be produced this summer.

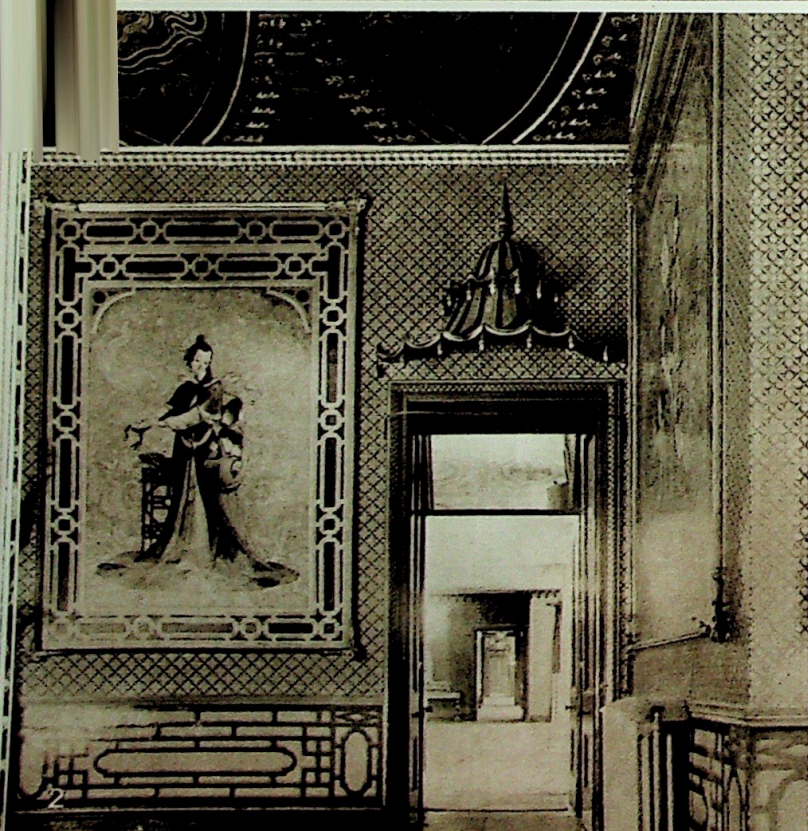

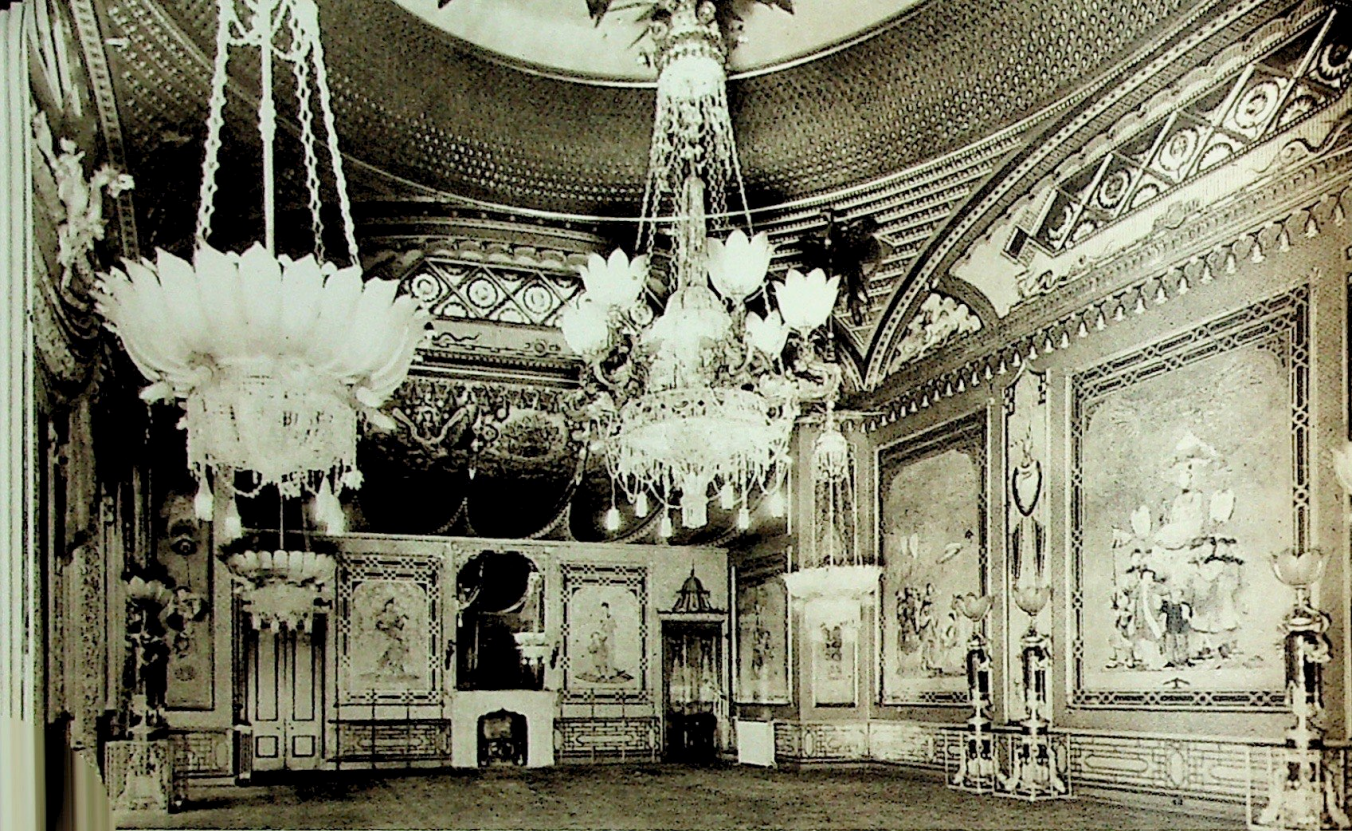

First-class Restaurant, licensed bars and lounges. Car park adjoining.

WHAT'S ON. A Weekly List of Events is issued by the Brighton and Hove Entertainments Association. Free copies can be obtained from Brighton Corporation Information Bureaux.

BRIGHTON INFORMATION BUREAUX

No publication of this size could present a completely detailed story of the thousand and one charms and attractions which Brighton offers her guests. Its purpose is rather to summarise those graces and charms with which Nature has endowed Brighton and those attractions and embellishments which have been added to her, as essential parts of the equipment of a modern resort, by enlightened Municipal and private enterprise.

For those seeking more detailed information, the Corporation has established Information Bureaux at Royal York Buildings, the Brighton Central Station ('Phone : Brighton 5579), and at Victoria Station, London ('Phone : Victoria 3333), at which enquiries are cordially welcomed.

ACCOMMODATION.

Visitors desiring further information regarding the Borough should write to the Publicity Manager, Brighton Corporation, Royal York Buildings, Brighton, 1, mentioning this Handbook. Those desirous of securing temporary accommodation in Hotels, Boarding Houses, etc., are advised to communicate with any of the establishments advertised in this Handbook. All advertisements are accepted in good faith, but the Corporation cannot, however, hold themselves responsible for the statements contained therein.

A list of Apartments and Programme of Events, etc., is issued monthly by Mr. R. M. Mackay, 40, Ship Street, Brighton, 1.

Information as to boarding accommodation for cats and dogs can be obtained from the Brighton Corporation Information Bureaux.

STAFF OUTINGS, Etc.

Organisers of Outings should apply to the Publicity Manager, as above, for list of Caterers and any other special information required.

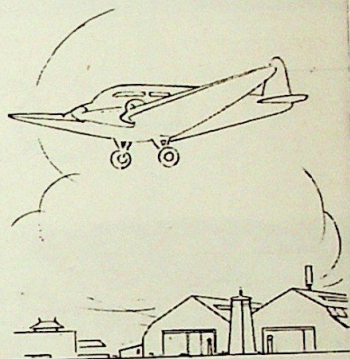

HOUSE AND SHOP PROPERTY.

Those wishing to purchase or rent property (furnished or unfurnished) in Brighton are recommended to apply to local House and Estate Agents advertising in this Handbook.

EMPLOYMENT ENQUIRIES.

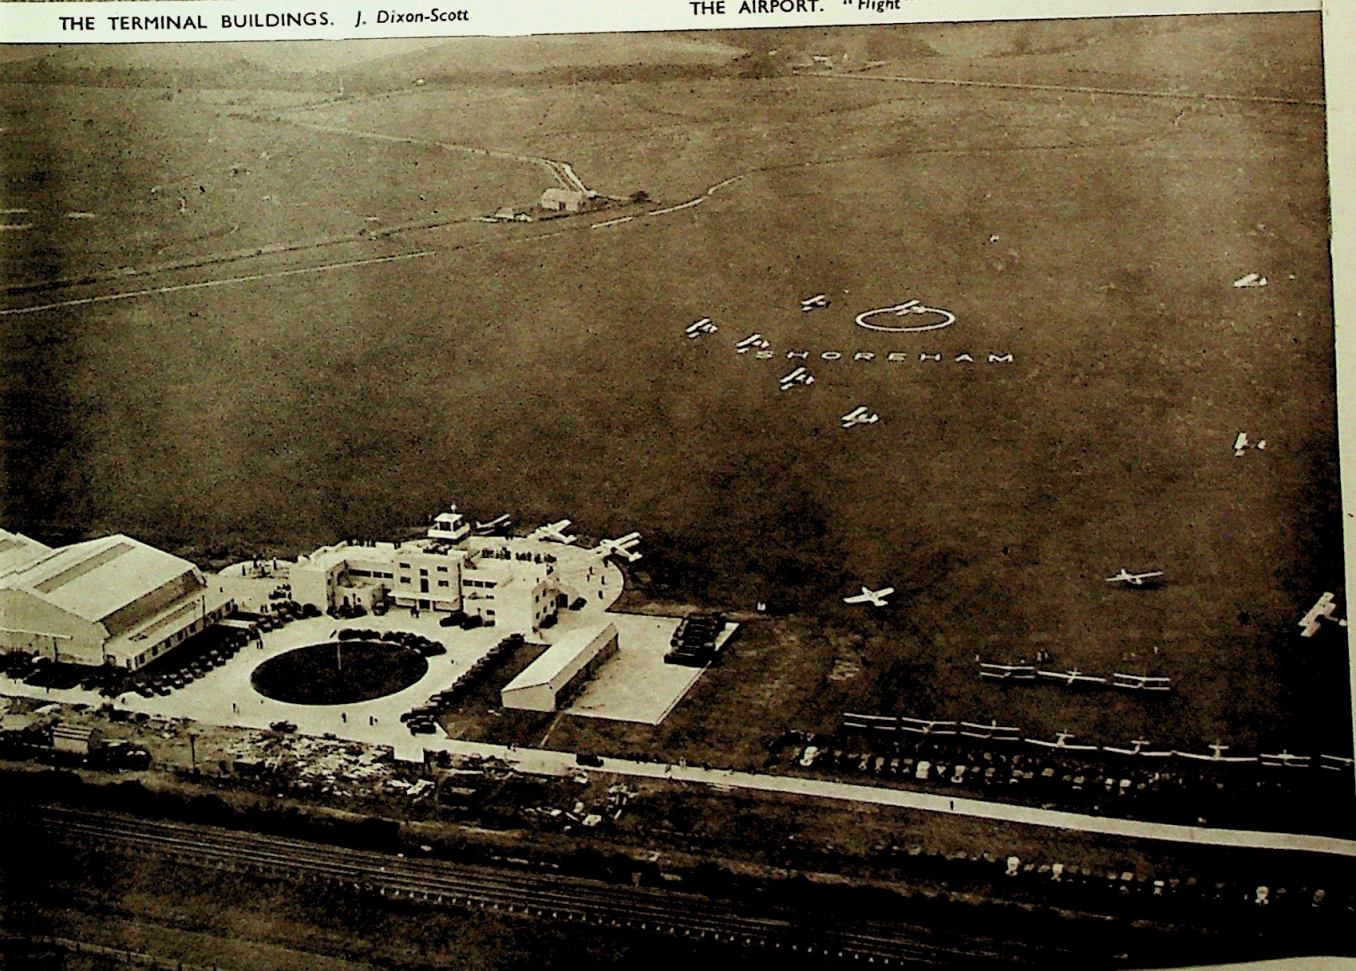

All enquiries in regard to labour requirements or employment in Brighton should be addressed to the Manager, Ministry of Labour, Employment Exchange, 130a, Western Road, Brighton, 1, who will be pleased to supply the information desired.

How difficult to decide! Especially after one has read all the current Hotel Advs. They all claim—to give the best food—to be in the best position in Brighton—to be the most moderate in their charges, etc.

Perhaps a few facts about my own Hotel may help you to make up your mind

We have 40 Bedrooms, all fitted with Hot and Cold Water, Gas Fires, Reading Lights with Bed Switches. Ground Floor Lounge facing Sea. Billiards, Dance Floor, Table Tennis. Lift to all Floors. Private Subway to Beach.

Garage for 1000 Cars within 100 yards of Hotel. Good Wines, Spirits, Beers and Minerals at Popular Prices. RECOMMENDED A.A. HOTEL.

NO Compulsory dressing for dinner	NO objection to children
NO irritating extra charges	NO need to ask for the Manager— The Proprietor lives on the premises and personally super- vises the business.
NO Head Waiter to tip in addition to your own Waiter.

IF YOU ARE LOOKING FOR THIS TYPE OF HOTEL
we have the accommodation you require at a price that is not so low as to preclude good food and service and not so high as to be beyond the means of those who like comfort.
